Dealing with Life's Problems

How often have you been living life, happy and content, and then suddenly life slaps you in the face with something unexpected? We all have problems, and the truth of the matter is that problems will never go away. They will just change form. One time you may be struggling with health, the next with money, and still the next with relationships. That is both the curse and blessing of life. However, you do not have to suffer because everything isn't perfect in your life.

Behind the Scenes of Problems,

Nothing becomes a problem until you label it so. You have probably noticed that different people have different opinions of what problems are, and how much attention should be given to any one thing. This means that problems exist in our heads, and that we create them, define them, and fear them.

The Most Overlooked Secret

The secret to dealing with life's problems is to realize that they are illusions of our imagination. Sure, they feel very real. Let's say you're driving your car merrily down the highway, until someone cuts you off. You might fly off the handle, or you might not. It will depend on how you perceive the situation. It's an excellent example of how some people create something to complain about where others are completely fine. Life will always have "problems" and the way to deal with them is to let them be. You don't have to try to analyze, fantasize, or figure out your problems. Let them figure them out. The more you try, the more you fuel the problem, and the more miserable you become. This doesn't mean you stop solving problems. It means you stop the compulsive worrying and fear-mongering inside your head.

How to Stop the Compulsive Worrying

You can stop the madness by simply staying present, and letting whatever happens be. This can be extremely hard if you bump into a problem that is important to you, but it is through those big problems that the biggest changes occur.

Why is Life so Hard?

Life can seem tough from time to time, but it is through those tough times that you grow as a human being. It's uncomfortable, but that's life.

Learning Lessons

Pointing out my own mistakes has been a planned part of my management philosophy. I do it because I cannot keep repeating that it is perfectly acceptable for the people around me to make mistakes in their work, and yet pretend that I never make them. What better way to send a message to the entire organization that it is okay to make mistakes than to point out my own?

I should clarify that I'm talking about bold mistakes, mistakes that come from taking risks, not about failing to do your job professionally. (Sending a letter with typos to a client because you did not use spell-check or skipped proofreading is not a mistake. It is unprofessional.)

The Necessity of Mistakes

I encourage people with whom I work to take risks and publicly attempt to reward risk-takers, especially when they fail. It is essential to be free of the fear of making mistakes.

Unfortunately, educators have helped make many people petrified of errors. The responsibility is also shared by a host of others—most of them well-meaning parents, spouses, friends, religious authorities, coworkers and employers.

However, for a company to achieve success, its people cannot be afraid to make errors. They must actually make hundreds of mistakes fearlessly as part of the process of learning what works and how to succeed.

Why do we hesitate to go back in time and attempt to learn from our own failures? The short answer is, because it can be painful. It takes a certain level of understanding and self-confidence to examine your own mistakes. Unfortunately, self-confidence is not a quality present in all people.

Leaders must create an environment where the workers understand it is not only okay, but essential to make mistakes on their way to greatness. When you believe positively that mistakes are a key part of the process and path to success, it takes away the burden of making them.

The Value of Mistakes

Mistakes are learning experiences that propel people toward success. Because of the knowledge they have acquired, these workers deserve more money as they become more valuable to the enterprise. There is no better way to reinforce risk-taking and bold deeds than by rewarding mistakes and failures.

And, although it's possible to learn from the mistakes of others, the lessons we learn from our own misjudgments are the most indelibly etched on our psyche—for better or worse. Sometimes a leader can be most supportive when he or she lets an associate try and fail with a risky idea, than by citing previous wisdom and dictating a course of action.

In any case, we need to learn to accept mistakes in leaders as well as in coworkers. Acceptance cannot be for the mistakes of our coworkers and peer group only. There must be absolute forgiveness for everyone, including managers and company presidents.

Leaders, by virtue of their position on the firing line, have the potential to make more mistakes. Their mistakes are often highly visible, with many witnesses, and they often involve large amounts of money. And, because leaders have power, they are sometimes able to conceal their mistakes. That, however, is wrong, as they could lose the benefit of learning from the errors. Instead, send the message to the organization that it's okay to make mistakes when attempting bold, new initiatives that are the lifeblood and future of your organizations.

You cannot buy or plan the kind of education that mistakes and failure provide. They demonstrate that you are out there on the front lines, taking risks and giving your best effort. Learning from your mistakes and failure makes you more valuable to any company. People who are confident in their abilities are not afraid to share their blunders. Rejoice in your mistakes and failures, celebrate as you gain experience “the hard way” and learn the valuable lessons that error and failure have to teach you.
